The article states in part, "But if the Irish stock market is to survive, it needs at least two local brokers. Even as things stand, limited analyst coverage of many smaller stocks listed on Euronext Dublin means that there is limited trading in them – making it very difficult to establish proper prices."

I'm not an expert in the trading area, but am aware of the use by foreign companies, including Irish ones, of ADR's. Maybe more Irish companies, including smaller listed stocks could attract U.S. investors using ADR's to increase trading volume in them? They can trade on U.S stockmarkets instead. Or is Ireland's financial system still too protectionist?
